

Emerging markets: on the road to Asia

5.3%: this is the growth rate forecast for Asian markets¹ in 2023, versus 4.0% for all emerging countries combined and 1.2% for developed countries, according to the International Monetary Fund (IMF)².

After a particularly turbulent year for financial markets, a global economic slowdown is taking shape in 2023, driven largely by the weak growth outlook of developed countries. In contrast, emerging countries appear well positioned to recover and hence boost global activity.

Aided by better macroeconomic fundamentals, a more favourable inflationary environment than in developed countries and China's reopening, some emerging countries offer attractive returns today for investors seeking sources of diversification.

Asia: a fertile ground for equity investors

The lifting of Covid-19 restrictions is set to open up new investment opportunities in Asian equity markets. Chinese and Korean equities, for example, offer particularly attractive valuations today compared with global equities.

A selective and rigorous approach is required to seize these opportunities, however. At Carmignac, we have identified a number of key themes with strong and sustainable growth potential in these markets: industrial and tech innovation, healthcare, the ecological transition and an upscaling of consumer spending.

China's comeback

After a two-year drop in the Chinese stock market, indicators are turning positive again. The country has ended moves to tighten its regulation, introduced aid measures for the real estate sector and finally lifted its “zero-Covid” policy, a sign of renewal for its domestic demand, strongly supported by Beijing’s policy.

The excess savings built up by Chinese consumers over three years of lockdowns and the recovery in the job market, which was severely affected by the health situation, should contribute to the consumer spending recovery.

And China has many companies geared towards domestic consumption, such as:

Anta Sports, the national sports equipment brand, which is gaining market share from multinational sports brands;

Miniso, the low-cost retail chain specializing in Chinese household and consumer goods, which is not well known by investors despite having more than 5,000 stores across the world³.

South Korea's technological firepower

The impact of China's reopening will spread beyond its borders. Hit by the global economic slowdown in 2022, South Korean equities are also trading today at attractive valuations, especially in the new technologies and semiconductors sectors.

For several decades, South Korea has stood out for its innovation in the electronics industry and new technologies. The country is home to a number of world leaders that are suppliers of consumer goods, such as screens for smartphones, and other high value-added electronic components, such as semiconductors⁴:

Samsung Electronics, the world's leading producer of technological components (mobile communication equipment, semi-conductors, new screens and consumer electronics and household appliances), has had a number one position in memories for telephones since 1993⁵;

LG Chem, one of the world's leading producers of batteries for electric vehicles (EV) with a share of more than 20% of the global market⁶, thus playing a key role in the energy transition.

Carmignac Emergents, our emerging equities Fund seeking to invest in current and future global technological leaders, has held Samsung Electronics and LG Chem among its principal positions for more than five years.

Besides the Chinese and Korean markets, economic conditions are also generally improving in other Asian and South-East Asian countries, such as India, Vietnam and Malaysia. While we remain cautious about India in the short term in view of high valuations and the deterioration of its macroeconomic fundamentals resulting from the energy crisis, some opportunities may prove attractive over the coming months.

In Asia, we think equity markets offer more potential than bond markets, where we identify principally tactical opportunities, such as in Malaysia. Latin American markets contain far more attractive opportunities to invest in emerging debt, in our view.
