Quarterly Performance Review

Equity markets recorded mixed performance over the quarter. In developed countries, the positive momentum driven by robust Covid-related fiscal and monetary stimulus and strong earnings growth stopped in September. Rising inflationary pressures and the perspective of a slowing pace of growth post-Covid have weighed on investors' enthusiasm. In the emerging world, the Chinese government's announcements of stiffer regulation of several sectors led to a market selloff. In this context, sector and geographic performances differed, with developed market financials, materials and energy leading the move.

While they clearly drove our outperformance in 2020, our Chinese positions led us to underperform this quarter and in 2021 to date. We believe we have built an expertise in finding secular growth companies over the years and had significant exposure to the region, which overflows with high growth opportunities. However, news flow over recent months has negatively impacted investor sentiment. The Chinese government has announced new initiatives and regulations with the aim of fostering "social prosperity" in the broad sense. Some examples would be probing the monopolistic behavior of the biggest Internet platforms, protecting consumer data security, and ensuring fair wages/benefits for temporary workers engaged in e-commerce and food delivery or ride sharing. While the initiatives appear rational, the market sold off on the lack of clarity as to how the changes would affect business models. On top of these regulatory measures, a potential default of Evergrande, a large Chinese property developer, raised fears about potential contagion to other parts of the economy. All of this considerably weighed on Chinese equities over the quarter.

Despite weakness in our Chinese exposure, other high convictions positions recorded good performance, like the cloud-based software company Salesforce, now the biggest position in our book. The company is emblematic of the secular growth companies that we look for. It has exposure to multiple aspects of the digital transformation that we are seeing across geographies and industries today, with a large total addressable market close to $175Bn as well as historically strong and sustainable earnings<sup>3</sup>. Cybersecurity company SentinelOne also contributed nicely. Organizations have faced new security challenges as the cloud and remote working have become a must. Many cybersecurity values have skyrocketed as a result, and the demand for next-generation security software in a new digital age is higher than ever. Global spending on cybersecurity is expected to exceed $120 billion by year-end and continues to be a high-growth sector in the future. We have sold our position in SentinelOne after very strong returns but bought US cybersecurity company Palo Alto Networks to retain exposure to this important thematic. Some of our top positions like Microsoft and Alphabet also recorded a positive performance.

Outlook

Our investment process revolves around identifying sustainable companies underpinned by powerful secular growth trends in order to invest in companies that can perform in different economic conditions. This allows us to build strong convictions that can outperform over the long term, and to avoid secularly challenged businesses that fail to offer long term attractive and visible growth.

As long-term investors, we see the sell-off in Chinese equities as creating good opportunities and attractive entry points. In fact, clearer regulation for big companies should be long term constructive for Chinese markets as it provides investors with more visibility on business models and improves corporate governance standards. However, selectivity prevails. We mostly focus on segments where a negative scenario has been priced in that we feel is not justified, and those where we see minimal government risk or outright government support towards the creation of Chinese champions – for example in drug development, technology or renewable energy.

For the coming months, we should expect weaker economic growth momentum due to lesser fiscal impulse and tightening monetary policies. This should result in headwinds to the earnings growth of the overall market - which we expect to favor companies benefiting from more visibility and structural themes. However, as inflationary pressures are rising, stock selection could become again key to make a difference even within the growth trend.

As a result, we maintain a liquid portfolio, diversified in terms of geography, sectors and themes. Our core thematic revolve around 1) the New Consumer (33%), with ecommerce players like China's JD.com and Amazon, sportswear brands Lululemon and Puma, and luxury company Hermes 2) the Digital Economy (30%), with fintech names like Square and Affirm, and software companies Salesforce and Kingsoft Cloud, and transport and meal delivery platform Uber 3) Advanced Healthcare (17%), with names like China's Wuxi Biologics and the American health provider Anthem, and 4) Climate change (6%) with Korean battery producer LG Chem and US residential solar provider SunRun.

The pandemic has served as an accelerator of existing trends. Online shopping, food delivery, digital payments, flexible work technology, and cloud-based infrastructure are not new, but the COVID crisis has vastly accelerated their adoption. Companies positioned to ride these trends are not only disrupting incumbents but extending their leads on their peers. These are the companies we are investing in.
